Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow.

Probably the most frustrating workplace irony for many of us is how we relentlessly pursue success but never seem to arrive at being successful. Of course, there are millions of successful people--Nobel Prize winners, college graduates, loving parents. But for a variety of reasons, so many of us do not feel successful even when we achieve much of what we are striving for. Particularly at work, we can find ourselves searching for wealth, recognition, and accomplishment, yet year in and year out, no matter how much we achieve, there's still something that seems to elude our grasp. The famed Greek fabulist Aesop shed some light on this dilemma more than twenty-six hundred years ago in a short tale entitled, "A Farmer and His Children":

A farmer, at death's door, wishing to impart to his children an important secret, called them to his deathbed and said, "My children, I am about to die. I would have you know, therefore, that our vineyard contains a hidden treasure—a treasure I have cherished all my life. Dig and you, too, will find it."

When their father died, the children took spade and pitchfork and turned the soil of the vineyard over and over again in their search for the treasure, which they were told lay hidden in the vineyard.

For weeks and weeks, they toiled, breathlessly searching every inch of the land. Finally, the children ended their search in frustration, for they had found no treasure. But to their surprise, the vines, after so much thorough digging, produced a bountiful, lush crop of grapes such as had never been seen before.

Like the farmer's children, we are all, in one way or another, looking for treasure at work: the promotion, new assignment, salary increase, recognition, big bonus. At times, it's as if we sense that work holds the winning number to life's lottery, and each day we toil in hopes of hitting the jackpot.

Yet like the farmer's children, most of us come up empty-handed. At times, work's disappointments can feel like a cruel joke. No matter how hard we work, no matter how much success we achieve, no matter how secure or celebrated we feel, it never seems enough. But Aesop's tale reveals a profound spiritual irony to our frustration: in mistakenly searching for a treasure that does not exist, we overlook the good fortune being cultivated right within our grasp.

I would have you know, therefore, that our vineyard contains a hidden treasure—a treasure I have cherished all my life. Dig and you, too, will find it."

When their father died, the children took spade and pitchfork and turned the soil of the vineyard over and over again in their search for the treasure, which they were told lay hidden in the vineyard.

For weeks and weeks, they toiled, breathlessly searching every inch of the land. Finally, the children ended their search in frustration, for they had found no treasure. But to their surprise, the vines, after so much thorough digging, produced a bountiful, lush crop of grapes such as had never been seen before.

Like the farmer's children, we are all, in one way or another, looking for treasure at work: the promotion, new assignment, salary increase, recognition, big bonus. At times, it's as if we sense that work holds the winning number to life's lottery, and each day we toil in hopes of hitting the jackpot.

Yet like the farmer's children, most of us come up empty-handed. At times, work's disappointments can feel like a cruel joke. No matter how hard we work, no matter how much success we achieve, no matter how secure or celebrated we feel, it never seems enough. But Aesop's tale reveals a profound spiritual irony to our frustration: in mistakenly searching for a treasure that does not exist, we overlook the good fortune being cultivated right within our grasp.
